"The truth is so simple, so lovingly simple: if we want to grow up, become true men and women, we have to face death before we die. We have to discover what it is to be able to slide behind the scenes and disappear."

Meditation is the only possible revolution.

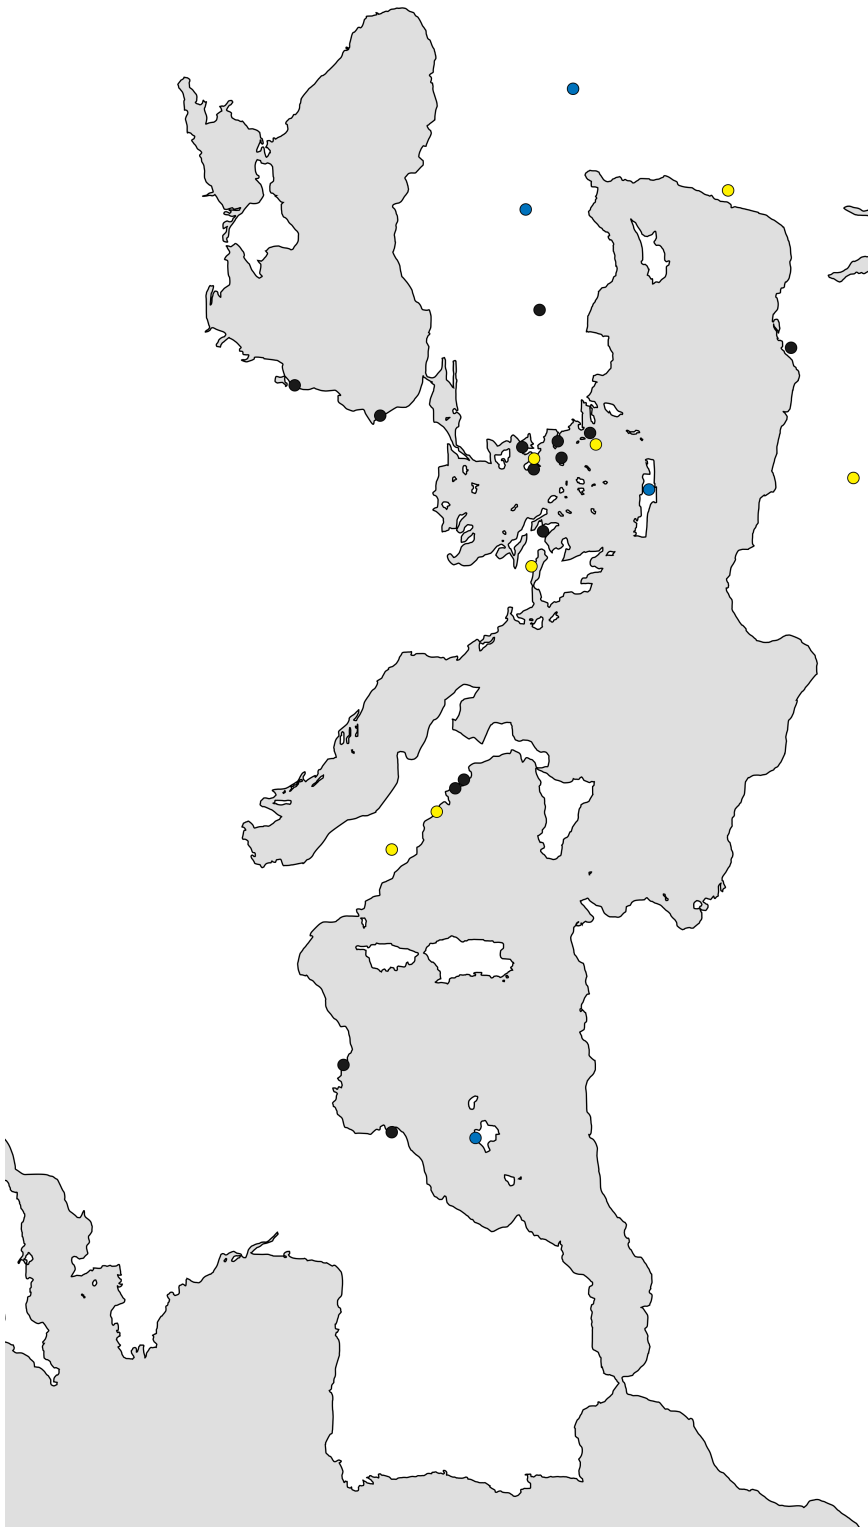

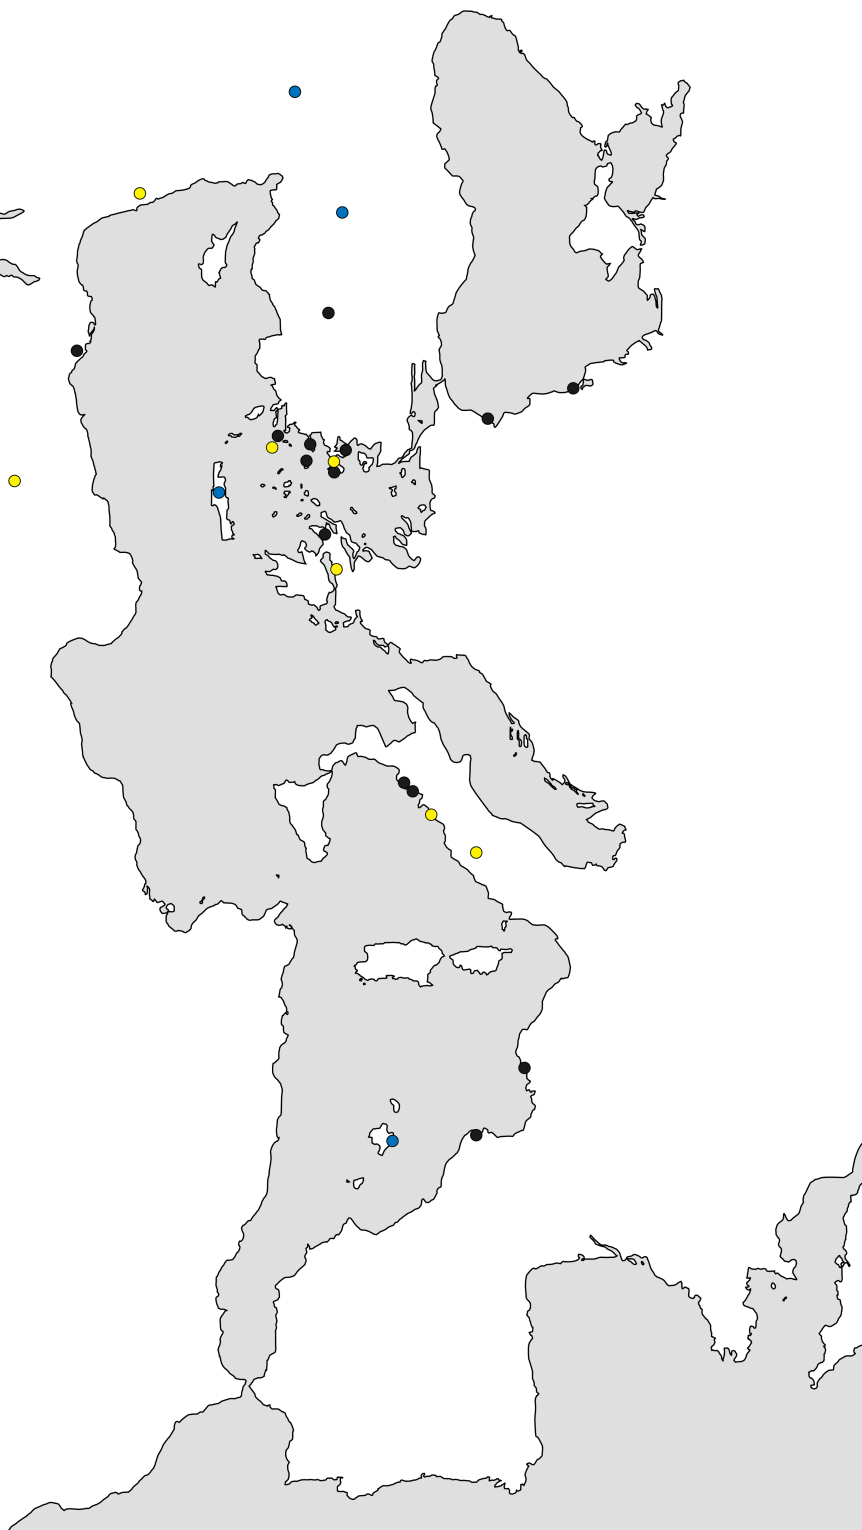

A black and white photograph showing a person's legs in a meditative pose, likely lotus or a similar seated position. The legs are crossed, and the feet are tucked towards the knees. The skin appears smooth and is lit with soft, natural light, creating subtle shadows. A semi-transparent grey rectangular box is positioned horizontally across the middle of the image, containing white text. The text is split into two parts by a bright green rectangular highlight.

Meditation is the only possible revolution.

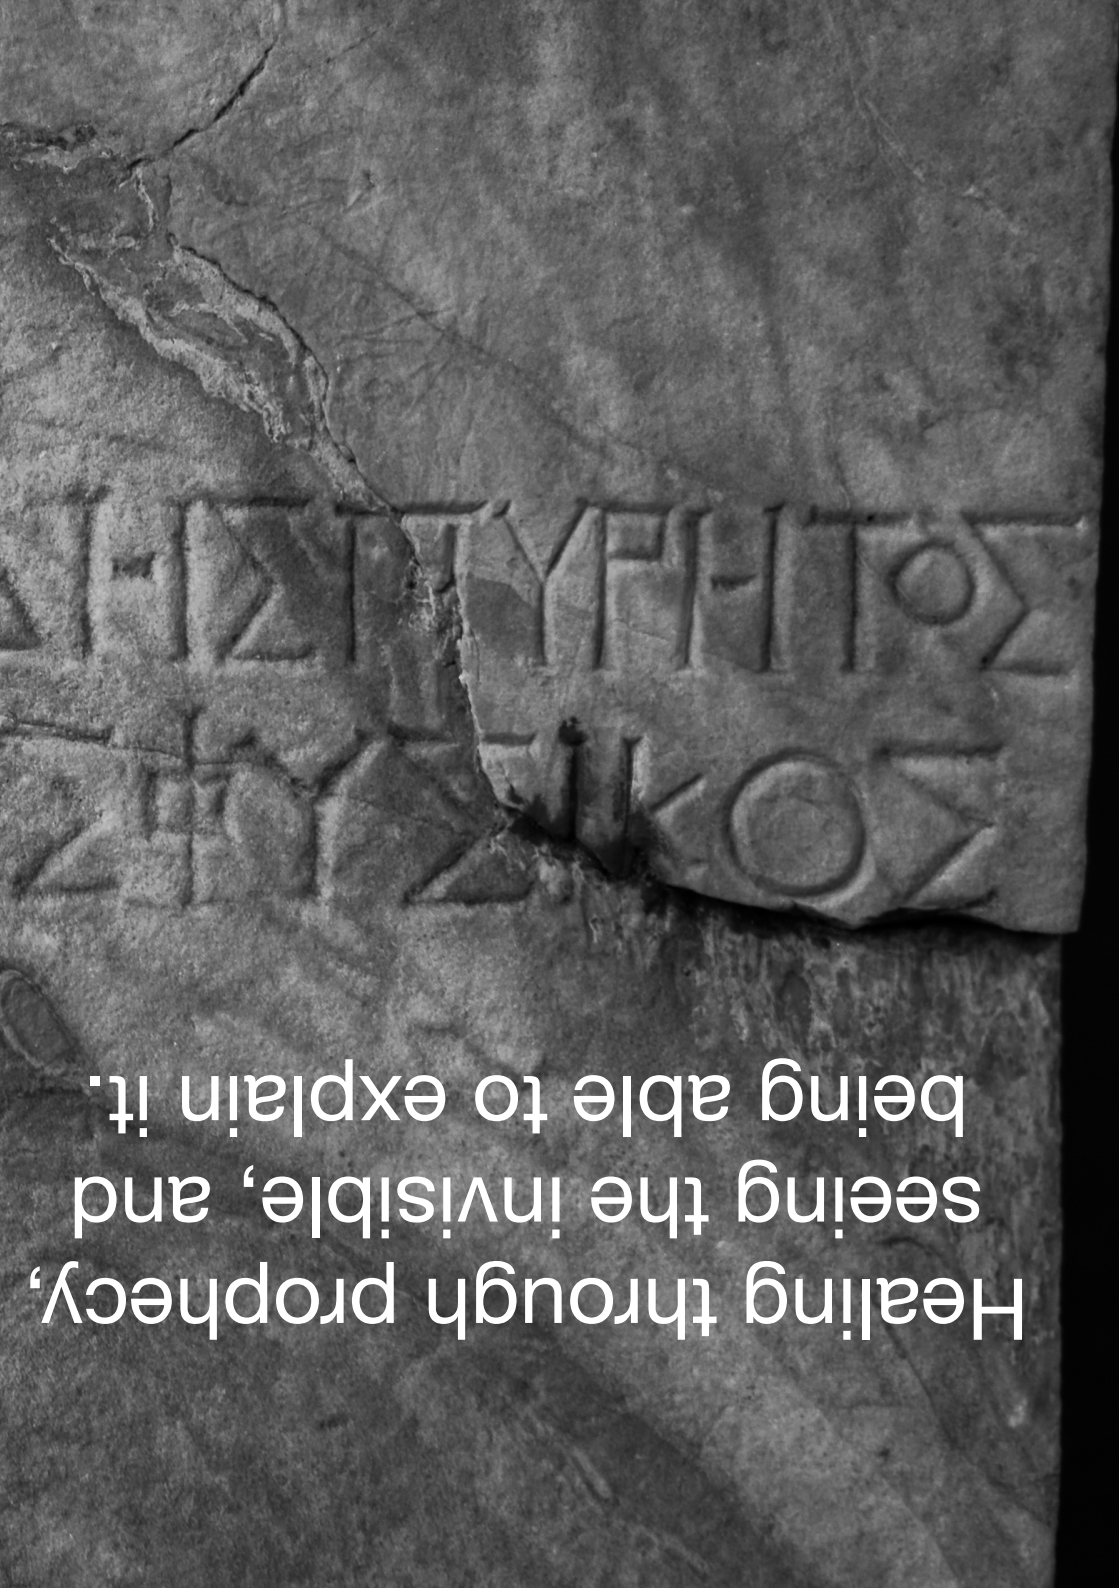

The feminine is not exclusive to women.

Healing through prophecy,
seeing the invisible, and
being able to explain it.

“For helplessness in their chests is what steers their wandering minds as they're carried along in a daze, deaf and blind at the same time, indistinguishable, undistinguishing crowds.”

Parmenides

“But what’s extraordinary is that the crucial thing we need for breaking free is already inside us: our longing. And the voice of our longing is repetition, insistently calling out to what’s beyond anything we’re familiar with or even understand.”

Peter Kingsley
